

Quitting Tobacco: How to Beat the Cravings

Nicotine and Your Brain

- As a smoker, you are used to having a certain level of nicotine in your body.
- Smoking gives the “pleasure center” (amyglia) in your brain repeated “hits” of nicotine.
- In response, your brain grows dependent on nicotine to feel better (relaxed or in control or content)
- The cycle of nicotine hits and brain dependence leads to more packs smoked and more money spent (What a marketing tool!!)
- “Triggers” are sights, sounds, smells, tastes and places that the brain remembers as “nicotine time.”
- Cravings happen when nicotine in the brain is reduced or eliminated.

What To Expect

- Cravings may last 2-3 minutes, but will occur repeatedly during while staying quit.
- The length and strength of cravings varies between individuals but the following tools may relieve, or even beat nicotine cravings!

What To Do

- Visit www.BecomAnEx.org, a free website where you can get a quit plan and connect with an online community.
- Talk to your doctor about the different nicotine replacement therapy (NRT) that can relieve cravings during the first 4 months of staying quit.
- Take deep breaths to get through a craving.
- Eat fresh vegetables, chew gum or sugar free candy instead of snacking.
- Exercise to lower the chance of gaining weight due to replacing smoking with snacking.
- Get support from family and friends.
- Be good to yourself if you slip.
